Personal Introduction

I'm Nicole Wei, originally from Beijing and currently a junior level Communication Design student at the Sam Fox School of Design & Visual Arts at Washington University in St. Louis, minoring in Human-Computer Interaction.

My practice focuses on graphic design, product design, and interaction design. In visual design, I emphasize the development of visual systems, typographic structures, and brand language, and I extend graphic design methodologies into digital product interfaces and interactive experiences. At the same time, I work across the full product design process, from product concept and UI/UX design to front-end implementation. I have contributed to the design and development of multiple web products and digital platforms, where I was responsible for product interface design, brand and promotional materials, design systems, and user experience optimization. Working closely with engineers, I helped bring products from 0 to 1, supporting their launch and real-world deployment.

Technically, I work with front-end development, creative coding, and 3D interactive technologies, and I often prototype interactions directly in code during the design process. I also make use of AI-assisted coding tools such as Cursor and Claude Code for vibe coding, accelerating design iteration and prototyping. More broadly, I am interested in how AI and emerging interaction technologies can be integrated into product design, exploring ways to make complex technologies more intuitive and accessible while creating thoughtful, human-centered digital experiences.
